The Emerald Handbook of Feminism, Criminology and Social Change
EMERALD STUDIES IN CRIMINOLOGY, FEMINISM AND SOCIAL CHANGE

Series Editors:
Sandra Walklate, Eleanor Rathbone Chair of Sociology, University of Liverpool conjoint Chair of Criminology, Monash University.
Kate Fitz-Gibbon, School of Social Sciences at Monash University and Monash
Gender and Family Violence Prevention Centre, Australia.
Jude McCulloch, Monash University and Monash Gender and Family Violence Prevention Centre, Australia.
JaneMaree Maher, Centre for Women’s Studies and Gender Research Sociology, Monash University, Australia.

Emerald Studies in Criminology, Feminism and Social Change offers a platform for innovative, engaged, and forward-looking feminist-informed work to explore the interconnections between social change and the capacity of criminology to grapple with the implications of such change.

Social change, whether as a result of the movement of peoples, the impact of new technologies, the potential consequences of climate change, or more commonly identified features of changing societies, such as ageing populations, intergenerational conflict, the changing nature of work, increasing awareness of the problem of gendered violence(s), and/or changing economic and political context, takes its toll across the globe in infinitely more nuanced and interconnected ways than previously imagined.
Each of these connections carry implications for what is understood as crime, the criminal, the victim of crime, and the capacity of criminology as a discipline to make sense of these evolving interconnections. Feminist analysis, despite its contentious relationship with the discipline of criminology, has much to offer in strengthening the discipline to better understand the complexity of the world in the twenty-first century and to scan the horizon for emerging, possible or likely futures.

This series invites feminist-informed scholars particularly those working comparatively across disciplinary boundaries to take up the challenges posed by social change for the discipline of criminology. The series offers authors a space to adopt and develop strong, critical personal views whether in the format of research monographs, single or co-authored books, or edited collections. We are keen to promote global views and debates on these issues and welcome proposals embracing such perspectives.

Forthcoming Titles in this Series:
Mothering from the Inside, Kelly Lockwood
Online Anti-rape Activism, Rachel Loney-Howes
Gender and the Violence(s) of War and Armed Conflict: More Dangerous to be a Woman?, Stacy Banwell
Young Women’s Carceral Geographies: Journeys In, Out, and Beyond Confinement, Anna Schliehe
Carceral Feminicidio: The Disappearance of Indigenous Women into Prisons, Gillian Balfour
Praise for The Emerald Handbook of Feminism, Criminology and Social Change

‘Nearly half a century after International Women’s Year, powerful mechanisms of gender inequality persist around the world. They generate poverty and cultural oppression, and are deeply implicated in violence, crime and victimization. This Handbook documents recent feminist criminology from many countries, highlighting gender dynamics around the Global South, new forms of online abuse, state violence, emerging theories of gender and crime, and creative strategies for social change. A great resource for criminology, and for the wider struggle for gender justice.’

Raewyn Connell, Author of Southern Theory and Gender: In World Perspective

‘This fascinating collection tells the story of how criminology and victimology were transformed by feminist perspectives, and reveals the compelling new insights critical perspectives on gender are bringing to the study of social harms, including those inflected by the legacies of colonialism, globalization and state-sanctioned forms of social control. Anyone in doubt as to the difference feminism and criminology can make to a world complexly fractured by violence, abuse and accumulating inequalities should read this book. Insightful, inspiring and empowering.’

David Gadd, Professor of Criminology, University of Manchester, UK

‘Does criminology “see” gender? This is the central question engaged in this wide-ranging, important and timely volume. This book engages this topic in ways that are theoretically and empirically expansive. The collection offers depth and breadth of engagement with the ways in which criminology has ignored, marginalized and sometimes engaged questions of gender and all its related intersections. It also explores theoretical, methodological and practical possibilities that are important for shaping the discipline into the future.

The book includes contributions that cover a broad range of topics that go beyond questions of gender in criminological research to include serious engagement with intersectionality, engagement with the hegemony of global northern theorizing and voice, as well as work that touches on questions of decolonization in the criminological agenda.

The book is fundamental reading in criminology, women’s and gender studies, and other disciplines interested in feminist work on violence, gendered violence in particular. This resource is essential for teachers in these fields and its interdisciplinary nature enables us to not only deconstruct disciplinary boundaries but also facilitates the asking of important questions about violence, victimhood and perpetration. I will recommend this book to all of my students and colleagues engaged in critical psychological work on violence and gender.’

Floretta Boonzaier, Professor of Psychology and Co-Director of the Hub for Decolonial Feminist Psychologies in Africa at the University of Cape Town, South Africa
Contents

About the Contributors xi
Acknowledgements xvii

Part One: The Origins of Feminist Criminology

Introduction to Part One 3

Chapter 1  Evolving Feminist Perspectives in Criminology and Victimology and Their Influence on Understandings of, and Responses to, Intimate Partner Violence
Kate Fitz-Gibbon, Sandra Walklate, Jude McCulloch and JaneMaree Maher 7

Chapter 2  Feminist Perspectives in Criminology: Early Feminist Perspectives
Loraine Gelsthorpe 17

Chapter 3  Feminist Approaches to Victimology
Jody Clay-Warner and Timothy G. Edgemon 35

Chapter 4  Feminist Activism and Scholarship in Resisting and Responding to Gender-based Abuse
Joanne Belknap and Deanne Grant 51

Chapter 5  Feminist Criminology in a Time of ‘Digital Feminism’: Can the #MeToo Movement Create Fundamental Cultural Change?
Annie Cossins 69
Part Two: Research Beyond the Global North

Introduction to Part Two

Chapter 6  Gender Violence Law Reform and Feminist Criminology in Brazil

Thiago Pierobom de Ávila
101

Chapter 7  The Contribution of Critical Ecofeminism to the Criminological Debate in Spain: Debating All Rules of All Tribes

Gema Varona
119

Chapter 8  Public Attitude Towards Rape Crime and the Treatment of Its Victims in Delhi City

Vibha Hetu
137

Chapter 9  On Honour, Culture and Violence Against Women in Black and Minority Ethnic Communities

Aisha K. Gill and Samantha Walker
157

Part Three: Extending the Criminological Agenda

Introduction to Part Three

Chapter 10  Masculinities and Interpersonal Violence

Stephen Tomsen and James W. Messerschmidt
185

Chapter 11  Disrupting the Boundaries of the Academe: Co-creating Knowledge and Sex Work ‘Academic-activism’

Laura Connelly and Teela Sanders
203

Chapter 12  Social Change and the Banality of Patriarchal Oppression and Gender Inequality

Dawn L. Rothe and Victoria E. Collins
219

Chapter 13  Reflections on Women’s Resistance and Social Change in Africa

Temitope B. Oriola
235

Chapter 14  Speaking Life, Speaking Death: Jerusalemite Children Confronting Israel’s Technologies of Violence

Nadera Shalhoub-Kevorkian
253
Chapter 15  Caught between a Rock and a Hard Place –
Human Rights, Life Imprisonment and Gender Stereotyping:
A Critical Analysis of Khamtokhu and Aksenichik v. Russia (2017)
Marion Vannier  271

Part Four: Looking to the Future

Introduction to Part Four  291

Chapter 16  Bringing Racialised Women and Girls into View:
An Intersectional Approach to Punishment and Incarceration
Julie Stubbs  295

Chapter 17  Technology and Violence Against Women
Bridget A. Harris  317

Chapter 18  Enhancing Feminist Understandings of Violence Against Women: Looking to the Future
Walter S. DeKeseredy  337

Chapter 19  Criminological Lessons on/from Sexual Violence
May-Len Skilbrei  357

Chapter 20  Gender-based Violence: Case Studies from the Global South
Melissa Bull, Kerry Carrington and Laura Vitis  373

Chapter 21  Postscript. Feminism, Activism and Social Change:
A Call to Action for Feminist Criminology
Nancy A. Wonders  395

Index  401
This page intentionally left blank
About the Contributors

Joanne Belknap is a Professor of Ethnic Studies at the University of Colorado-Boulder, a Past-president of the American Society of Criminology, and has won numerous research, teaching, and service awards. The fifth edition of her book, The Invisible Woman: Gender, Crime, and Justice, is in progress.

Melissa Bull is a Professor in the School of Justice, and the Director of the QUT Centre for Justice, at the Queensland University of Technology, Australia. Her expertise lies in the field of crime control and governance, with a focus on comparative criminology and policing in differently organised states.

Kerry Carrington is the Head of the School of Justice, Faculty of Law, Queensland University of Technology, Australia. She is a leading scholar in the field of feminist criminology, author of Southern Criminology (Routledge, 2019) and Feminism and Global Justice (Routledge, 2015), and has an ARC grant to study women’s police stations in Argentina.

Jody Clay-Warner is Meigs Distinguished Professor of Sociology and Associate Director of the Owens Institute for Behavioral Research, University of Georgia. Her research focusses on criminal victimisation with a focus on violence against women and revictimisation. Her recent projects examine campus sexual assault and human trafficking.

Victoria E. Collins is an Associate Professor in the School of Justice Studies at Eastern Kentucky University, USA. Victoria has published three books including State Crime, Women and Gender (Routledge, 2016); The Violence of Neoliberalism: Crime, Harm and Inequality (Routledge, 2019); and Explorations in Critical Criminology: Essays in Honor of William J. Chambliss (Brill, 2019) in addition to articles in journals such as Social Justice, Crime and Justice, Crime, Media, Culture, Critical Criminology, Critical Sociology, and Contemporary Justice Review.

Laura Connelly is a Lecturer in Criminology at the University of Salford. Her research interests include the sex industry, migration, ‘modern slavery’, and ‘post-racial’ theory. There is a social justice element to Laura’s work, which centres on the rights of (migrant) sex workers and challenging police injustices.
Annie Cossins is a Professor of Law and Criminology in the Faculty of Law, University of New Wales, Sydney, Australia. Her previous theoretical monographs in the area of feminist criminology include Masculinities, Sexualities and Child Sexual Abuse (2000) and Female Criminality: Infanticide, Moral Panics and the Female Body (2013).

Walter S. DeKeseredy is Anna Deane Carlson Endowed Chair of Social Sciences, Director of the Research Center on Violence, and Professor of Sociology at West Virginia University. He has published 25 books, 100 scientific journal articles, and 80 scholarly book chapters on violence against women and other social problems.

Timothy G. Edgemon is a Doctoral student at the University of Georgia. The overarching goal of his research is to understand how the criminal justice system operates as an engine of inequality. His work primarily focusses on how contact with the criminal justice system impacts mental health outcomes and how these health outcomes differ along gendered lines.

Kate Fitz-Gibbon is a Senior Lecturer in Criminology in the School of Social Sciences at Monash University (Australia) and Deputy Director of the Monash Gender and Family Violence Prevention Centre. Her research examines family violence, the law of homicide, and the impact of criminal law reform across Australian and international jurisdictions.

Lorraine Gelsthorpe is Professor of Criminology and Criminal Justice and Director of the Institute of Criminology, University of Cambridge, UK. Her publications include Feminist Perspectives in Criminology (1990, edited with Allison Morris, Open University Press) and regular contributions to the Oxford Handbook of Criminology (Oxford University Press) on ‘Feminism and Criminology’. Her key research revolves around women and criminal justice.

Aisha K. Gill, Ph.D., FRSA, CBE, is a Professor of Criminology at the University of Roehampton, UK. Her main areas of interest and research are health and criminal justice responses to violence against black, minority ethnic, and refugee women in the UK, Iraqi Kurdistan, India, and Pakistan. She has been involved in addressing the problem of violence against women and girls, ‘honour’ crimes, and forced marriage at the grassroots level for the past 21 years. She is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts, editorial member of the British Journal of Criminology and Feminist Review Collective.

Deanne Grant holds Master’s degrees in Indigenous Governance and International Studies and has a Ph.D. in Ethnic Studies from the University of Colorado-Boulder and is an Assistant Professor at Fort Lewis College in the Sociology and the Native American and Indigenous Studies Departments. Her specific research interests include Indigenous feminisms, Native American and Indigenous studies, and Native American women.

Bridget A. Harris is an Australian Research Council ‘Discovery Early Career Researcher Award’ Fellow and Senior Lecturer in the School of Justice, Faculty of Law, and member of the Centre for Justice and Digital Media Research Centre at Queensland University of Technology. Her forthcoming collection on technology and domestic violence - edited with Delanie Woodlock - will be published by Routledge.

Vibha Hetu is a Consultant at L.N.J.N. National Institute of Criminology and Forensic Science, Ministry of Home Affairs, Delhi, India. Earlier, she was an Assistant Professor at O.P. Jindal Global University, Sonipat, Haryana. Her first book Victims of Rape: Rights, Expectations and Restoration is published by Thomson Reuters in 2017.

JaneMaree Maher is Professor and Director of the Centre for Women’s Studies and Gender Research Sociology at Monash University. She works on gendered violence and hate crimes using feminist legal paradigms. Her research also addresses family and gender issues with a focus on women's caring and employment in family life.

James W. Messerschmidt is Distinguished University Professor of Sociology and Chair of the Criminology Department at the University of Southern Maine, USA. In addition to over 75 articles and book chapters, he has authored 14 books, most recently Masculinities and Crime: A Quarter Century of Theory and Research. 25-Year Anniversary Edition. (Rowman & Littlefield, 2018).

Jude McCulloch is a Professor of Criminology at Monash University and the Director of the Monash Gender and Family Violence Prevention Centre. Her research looks at the boundaries between public and private violence and the implications of this for women and the concept of national security.

Temitope B. Oriola is a joint Editor-in-Chief of African Security and an Associate Professor at the University of Alberta, Canada. A recipient of the prestigious Governor General of Canada Academic Gold Medal, Oriola’s book Criminal Resistance? The Politics of Kidnapping Oil Workers (Routledge, 2016 [orig. 2013]) is one of a small number of book-length sociological investigations of political kidnapping in the English language. Oriola’s ongoing research focusses on the ascendance of extremist non-state transnational actors, particularly in the Lake Chad Basin. This research investigates the intricacies of the ascendance of Boko Haram, the trends and patterns of Boko Haram’s operations, the gender dimensions (particularly sexual and gender-based violence), and the backdrop of global jihadi terrorist trajectories. Dr Oriola has published in leading scholarly venues such as Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, Third World Quarterly, Sociology, the British Journal of Criminology, Canadian Journal of Criminology & Criminal Justice, Criminal Justice Ethics and Critical Studies on Terrorism, among others. He is a Vice President (president-elect) of the Canadian Association of African Studies.

Thiago Pierobom de Ávila is an Associate Professor in the Ph.D. Programme of UniCEUB, Brasilia, Brazil. He is an Associate Researcher in the Institute for Criminal Law and Sciences, University of Lisbon, Portugal and a Fellow of Monash University Gender and Family Violence Prevention Centre, Australia. He is also a Senior Prosecutor at the Office of the Attorney General, Brasilia, Brazil.

Dawn L. Rothe is a Professor at the School of Criminology and Criminal Justice, Florida Atlantic University, USA. She is the author of 10 books including Crimes of the Powerful: An Introductory Text (Routledge, 2016); The Violence of Neoliberalism: Crime, Harm and Inequality (Routledge, 2019); and Explorations in Critical Criminology: Essays in Honor of William J. Chambliss (Brill, 2019) in addition to nearly 100 articles and book chapters.

Teela Sanders is a Professor of Criminology at the University of Leicester. Her research focusses on the intersections between gender, regulation, governance, and crime, specifically in relation to the sex industry. She is working on a two-year Leverhulme Research Fellowship titled ‘Revisiting the Brothels’.

Nadera Shalhoub-Kevorkian is the Lawrence D. Biele Chair in Law at the Faculty of Law-Institute of Criminology and the School of Social Work and Public Welfare at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. She is a Palestinian feminist activist and the Director of the Gender Studies Programme at Mada al-Carmel, the Arab Center for Applied Social Research in Haifa, and was recently appointed as the Global Chair in Law – Queen Mary University of London.

May-Len Skilbrei is a Professor of Criminology at the University of Oslo, Norway. She has published on prostitution, human trafficking, and sexual violence, most recently in British Journal of Criminology, Annual Review of Criminology, and Anti-Trafficking Review. She recently co-edited the book Rape in the Nordic Countries (Routledge, 2020).

Julie Stubbs is a Professor in the Faculty of Law, UNSW, Sydney, Australia. She has published widely on domestic violence, homicide, battered woman syndrome, sexual assault, restorative justice, bail, women’s imprisonment, and justice reinvestment. Her books include Justice Reinvestment: Winding Back Imprisonment (with Brown et al., Palgrave, 2016) and Australian Violence: Crime, Criminology and Beyond (edited with S. Tomsen, The Federation Press, 2016).

Stephen Tomsen is a Professor of Criminology at the University of Western Sydney, Australia. He has decades of experience with researching topics in sociological inequality, violence, masculinity, sexuality, drinking, drug use, urban order, and criminal justice. His current research includes a team study of gendered violence and harm at public music festivals, and another on uneven official responses to the vulnerabilities due to urban drinking and drug use.

Marion Vannier is a Lecturer in Criminology at the University of Manchester. She publishes on long-term imprisonment and immigration detention. Her forthcoming book is Normalizing Extreme Imprisonment: the case of life without parole in California (1900-2016) (Oxford University Press, 2020).
Gema Varona is a Senior Researcher at the Institute of Criminology, University of the Basque Country and teaches Victimology and Criminal Policy. She was the former Coordinator of the degree in Criminology and a Co-director of the Master in Victimology in the University of the Basque Country. She is the Co-editor of the Journal of Victimology/Revista de Victimología.

Laura Vitis is a Lecturer in the School of Justice, Faculty of Law, Queensland University of Technology, Australia. Her research focusses on how technology is used to facilitate gendered, sexual, and intimate partner violence. In addition, her work examines the regulation of and resistance to technologically facilitated violence, youth sexting, and the sex offender register.

Samantha Walker is a Criminologist based in Plymouth, UK. In 2018, she received her Ph.D. from Keele University for her research on ‘honour’-based violence and victimisation in rural communities. Her current research interests explore the intersections between honour, shame, and violence in a multitude of social, cultural, and gendered contexts; neoliberalism, austerity, and social harm within the criminal justice system; and pornography, sexual deviancy, and harm.

Sandra Walklate is Eleanor Rathbone Chair of Sociology and Conjoint Chair of Criminology in the School of Social Sciences at Monash University. Her research continues to be focussed on criminal victimisation and its impact particularly in relation to violence against women.

Nancy A. Wonders is a Professor of Criminology and Criminal Justice at Northern Arizona University. She has served as the Chair of the American Society of Criminology’s Division on Women and Crime and has published extensively on global injustices, the criminology of borders and mobility, and the relationship between inequality, difference, and justice.
This page intentionally left blank
Acknowledgements

This book is part of a wider project and team work emanating from the Gender and Family Violence Prevention Centre at Monash University, Australia. The editors owe a debt of gratitude to the rest of the team working with us at the Centre. In particular, we are grateful for the support of Dr Jasmine McGowan, Associate Prof. Silke Meyer, Dr Naomi Pfitzner, Dr Tess Bartlett, and Kate Thomas (now working for Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety) for keeping the work of the Centre going whilst we were focussed on this and other projects.

Throughout our work, together we have benefitted from the insights and expertise of many feminist scholars. We would like to thank those who attended the Intimate Partner Violence, Risk and Security Workshop at Monash Prato in September 2017, that resulted in the edited collection, Fitz-Gibbon, K., Walklate, S., McCulloch, J. and Maher, J. (Eds). 2018. Intimate Partner Violence, Risk and Security: Securing Women’s Lives in a Global World, London, Routledge. Some of those who attended this workshop have also contributed to this handbook and we are very appreciative of their ongoing willingness to work with us. Other contributors took a risk to work with us for the first time. We hope you have enjoyed the experience as much as we have enjoyed working with you all and everything we have all learned together in this journey. It is the case that this collection has brought together some hugely important and insightful work and we are very grateful to our contributors for ensuring that this will be a flagship collection.

At the same time, of course, our life as editors goes on in other realms too. We would like to acknowledge the wider support of colleagues at Monash University for the collegiality offered to us all along with that provided by our respective partners and families who continue to support us with good humour and patience.

The Editors
December 2019.
Part One

The Origins of Feminist Criminology
Introduction to Part One

In proposing a handbook on The Emerald Handbook of Feminism, Criminology and Social Change, our objective was to capture and collate the substantive contributions of feminist criminology, but also to recognise and record the transformative interventions of feminist scholarship in criminology more broadly. Each of the chapters in this opening section of the volume chart specific and detailed feminist contributions to areas of criminology such as victimology, research practice and methodologies and understandings of crime, but they simultaneously point to the alterations these interventions have generated in criminology. The chronologies of change that they offer in these different areas of criminology are both concrete and conceptual and they are always connected to and driven by social debate and contestation. As Gelsthorpe reflects in this volume, ‘the methodological and epistemological is political’.

In this opening chapter, the editors review the nature of different feminist perspectives and the impact that they have had on criminology and victimology. They pay particular attention to the challenges of inter-disciplinarity as central to feminist projects and reflect upon the influence of diverse feminist voices in both past and present. This chapter will lay the foundation for the contributions which follow and will make the case for the importance of appreciating these contributions within their global context and chronological position.

In her chapter on feminist work, Loraine Gelsthorpe revisits the early history of feminist interventions in criminology in the UK and other Western countries. She illuminates the on-going epistemological challenges inherent in bringing feminist perspectives to bear on a generally ‘androcentric’ criminological enterprise. Offering a valuable chronology that spans the second half of the twentieth century, the chapter is centrally concerned with the different ways in which feminist scholars in criminology grappled with the question of how to produce good quality knowledge that locates gender, and its consequent inequalities, at the heart of criminology. The positioning of ‘woman’ as a conceptual term which transformed the criminological framework in Carol Smart’s (1976) pioneering work Women, Crime and Criminology began a series of gendered interventions grounded in critical feminist perspectives. Gelsthorpe also documents the evolution of feminist work itself: while early approaches tended to concentrate on the inadequacies and omissions of criminology, on ‘adding’ women’s experiences and outcomes to existing knowledges, subsequent work goes further and challenges the framework of mainstream criminology. Interventions into central practices and conventions of criminological research, such as Sylvia Walby et al.’s (2015) critique of conventional counting of violent incidents address fundamental knowledge production practices and argue for the need to embed gender to achieve veracity, accuracy and social change. Gelsthorpe’s final reflection, following Heidensohn, that criminology definitely needed feminism, and continues to need it, is pertinent to the remaining chapters in the section and in this volume. The processes by which feminist criminology has created change have been gradual, complex and not always uni-directional, as other contributors highlight.

If gender is understood as central to the commission, patterns and prevalence of crime itself, the impact of gender on patterns of victimisation is immediately highlighted. In their chapter on ‘Feminist Approaches to Victimology’, Jody Clay-Warner and Timothy G. Edgemon document how feminist scholarship has changed victimology, in terms of domain knowledge, in terms of our understanding and in terms of understanding of the term victim, and centrally in how we consider the experiences of, and outcomes for, victims of crime. Clay-Warner and Edgemon highlight key themes in victimology informed by feminist knowledges: (1) the gendered nature of criminal victimisation, (2) victimisation of women (and threat of victimisation) as a means of informal social control, (3) examination of ways in which legal structures limit women’s ability to report victimisation and to prosecute offenders and (4) the relationship between women’s victimisation and offending. They highlight the gendered biases and inequalities built into early victimology where the study of victims centred on their role in ‘triggering’ the violence(s) that were perpetrated against them and the destructive ways in which this approach impacted women in particular. Their excavation of underlying assumptions about causes of victimisation and offending reveal both the persistence and protection of the gendered social order and the challenges already mounted by, and still required, from feminist-informed victimology.

Challenging the gendered social order is also a central theme of the chapter by Joanne Belknap and Deanne Grant. In ‘Feminist Activism and Scholarship in Resisting and Responding to Gender-based Abuse’, they review the contribution of feminist criminologists and activists to moving violence against women (VAW) from an area of concern for women and feminists to a global focus. They chart the influence of feminist concerns and activism in driving and embedding recognition that the prevalence and ramifications of VAW are critical well beyond the experiences of individual women. Belknap and Grant examine a range of gender-based abuses, such as honour killings, fistula, forced marriage, sexual harassment and stalking, but their central focus is on intimate partner abuse and rape. In taking this approach, they point to one of the key contributions of feminist criminology, which is the challenge to distinctions of public and private violence and the implications for what we consequently understand as criminal. The complex pathway towards recognising rape in marriage is emblematic of such shifts, and the barriers that have existed and continue to exist in securing the everyday safety of survivors of gendered violence, holding abusers accountable and working towards safer communities. As Clay-Warner and Edgemon comment elsewhere in this volume, the irony, of course, is that avoiding going out alone at night, riding public transportation, etc. is directed as preventing violent crimes by strangers, while women face the greatest risk from men they know.

This gendered assessment of risk, and recognition of its implications, has been central to the work of feminist criminology and its programme of social change. The link between scholarship and activism highlighted by Belknap and Grant also speaks to one of the central insights of this volume. While it is not possible to fully capture the historical and contemporary efforts of activists to respond to and prevent VAW across the world, they point to intertwined epistemological and activist efforts to identify VAW as a serious social problem, to scope the various and often overlapping types of VAW and to implement a range of responses that change women’s experiences. As Ann Oakley (2000) has persuasively argued, we cannot distinguish ways of knowing from the gendered social relations that produced them. Challenges to these gendered social relations will necessarily be both conceptual and social: and as this chapter shows, innovative and effective change often emerges at this intersection.

This intersection of activism and scholarship underpins the chapter contributed by Annie Cossins, ‘Feminist Criminology in a Time of ‘Digital Feminism’: Can the #MeToo Movement Create Fundamental Cultural Change?’ Cossins begins with an examination of the ways in which the #MeToo movement can be situated within a long history of feminist criminology’s recognition of the cultural significance of the concepts of sex and gender, bodies and social practices in how we understand and respond to crimes. This focus on sex, gender and bodies has been a key aspect of the transformation proposed by feminist criminological scholarship. As Cossins observes here, [t]he sex of the body matters within each different cultural/racial milieu so that women and girls quickly learn from their own men about the specific cultural values associated with their bodies.

Cossins explores the social significance of the body and, in particular, how sex intersects with race, ethnicity and class to document feminist criminology’s role in order to understand different women’s experiences of men’s sexual violence.

Yet, the focus of this chapter, the final in this section, on the #MeToo movement highlights some dispiriting realities. As Cossins shows, the outcomes of the #MeToo movement have revealed the extent of sexual assault and harassment in workplaces, the extent of male privilege and entitlement, across lines of diversity and power and the systemic failure of systems designed to protect women and girls. When we chart the origins and trajectory of feminist criminology, we see the impact of radical, activist and transformative scholarship but we also face the magnitude of the work still to be done. It is to this work that the following sections in the volume turn.
References

Chapter 1

Evolving Feminist Perspectives in Criminology and Victimology and Their Influence on Understandings of, and Responses to, Intimate Partner Violence

Kate Fitz-Gibbon, Sandra Walklate, Jude McCulloch and JaneMaree Maher

Abstract

In this opening chapter, the editors review the nature of different feminist perspectives and the impact that they have had on criminology and victimology. They will pay particular attention to the influence of diverse feminist voices in both past and present and the ongoing challenges posed by the emergence of southern criminology and the recourse to law as an avenue to securing change for women living with violence.

Keywords: Criminology; victimology; feminisms; gender; violence(s) against women; masculinities

Introduction

This chapter examines feminist responses to criminology and victimology over time, acknowledging that the work of feminisms as it intersects with these two domains has evolved and has met different challenges. In the first part of this chapter, we offer an examination of the emergence of criminology and victimology and the different forms of feminism including the work of liberal, radical, postmodern and third/fourth wave feminism that have made their presence felt in each of these areas of investigation. Here we are deliberate in our use of the term ‘feminisms’ as we acknowledge that over time and at any one given time there is no single feminist voice or view (this follows on from terminology set up in Fitz-Gibbon and Walklate, 2018, see also Daly and Chesney-Lind, 1988: 501). In the second part of this chapter, we move on to examine two of the more recent challenges for feminist criminology and victimisation – the emergence and impact of northern theorising and the fraught relationship between feminism and legal responses to intimate partner violence. Throughout we reflect upon the evolving role and influence of understandings of sex and gender on crime, criminal behaviour and criminal victimisation and, in the second half of the chapter, in responses to violence against women.

Sex, Criminology and Victimology through the Ages

The domains of criminology and victimology share foundations in positivism. Positivism influenced much of the discipline’s early work and framing of knowledge around how to understand behaviours and the role of systems and structures (Roshier, 1989; Fitz-Gibbon and Walklate, 2018). Certainly, in terms of criminology, and to an extent victimology, much of this early work focussed upon this version of scientific endeavour (characterised by determinism, differentiation and pathology, Roshier, 1989) to better understand the drivers of crime, the behaviours of the criminal and how this knowledge could inform the more effective policy responses. The seminal work of Cesare Lombroso has come to epitomise the thinking of this era of criminology. Lombroso was heavily influenced by Darwinian principles alongside the emergence of biogenetics as an explanation for understanding who was and was not ‘criminal’. From this perspective, Lombroso proposed that criminals were biologically distinct from ‘normal’ humans and were rather ‘a throwback’ to an earlier state of evolutionary ancestry; an atavistic degeneration (Fitz-Gibbon and Walklate, 2018). Lombroso used the concept of atavism to explain criminality as an abnormal behaviour. This work inspired and gave rise to a body of criminological knowledge that adopted an anthropological, biological and positivist perspective to explaining criminal behaviour (e.g., the work of Hall-Williams, 1982 on the ‘chemistry of crime’).

This early work of the discipline was heavily influential in how the knowledges of criminology and victimology developed in terms of explanations for crime and criminality. In particular this work was pivotal to how sex differences were considered and accounted for and later proved influential in how sociological understandings of deviancy and delinquency took sex into account (Fitz-Gibbon and Walklate, 2018). While the work of victimologists emerged later than that of criminologists, it too was focussed on the development of typologies to understand victimisation and non-victimisation (see, e.g., the work of Hentig and Mendelsohn). In the same way that Lombroso and other criminologists had sought to categorise who did and did not become criminal, early victimology scholars adopted a determinist perspective to examine the characteristics common to ‘victims’ as a category of individual distinct from non-victims. Like criminology’s early treatment of sex, the early work of victimologists was largely based on the assumption that the ‘normal’ individual was white, heterosexual and male.

The subcultural study of crime and criminology in the 1950s and 1960s largely continued this viewpoint, furthering the assumption that female offending